The field of sport management stands at an academic crossroads; the essays in this book address the following and other emerging questions: Should our successful field of study continue to model other disciplines and perpetuate their successes, as well as their shortcomings, or should we determine our own specific model for academic success? How are we doing in preparing future sport managers to perform in the industry and on the global stage? Where do we belong in the scheme of academe? The book's goal is to generate discussion among sport management professors, industry professionals who serve as adjunct faculty and participate on sport management program advisory boards, doctoral students who intend to teach in sport management programs, and others who explore and critique higher education in general.

This book examines the manner in which successful firms develop, transfer, protect, and capture value from technological innovation. In essence, it is about 'knowledge management', which lies at the foundation of firm level competitive advantage in today's global economy. The essays contain some of the fundamental contributions to the field of knowledge management by one of its best-known thinkers; they also constitute an immensely practical guide for those managers who wish to look below the surface of what is going on in Silicon Valley and elsewhere.

Collection of provocative essays on how to improve cultural resource management practice by the leading consultant in the field.

Micha Hirschinger emphasizes the importance of foresight on logistics and institutions in particular for effective decision making as distinct research in this context is limited. He applies a systematic and transferable multi-method approach based on Delphi studies and fuzzy c-means cluster analysis to develop profound scenarios for the future. He uses the relevance of information-processing requirements to investigate whether centralization of purchasing organizations increases functional efficiency. The author finally shows how a sharing-economy business model transfer could help to overcome the limited access to factor markets, especially trucks, at the base of the pyramid.

In this dissertation, we study three problems within the context of information security and risk management. The first essay focuses on risk management in an adversarial classification setting. The remaining two essays address issues related to managing information security through outsourcing.

"This thesis contains three essays broadly related to topics in revenue management, service operations, and market design. In the first essay, we seek to identify conditions under which a ride-sharing platform such as Uber or Lyft, benefit from offering passengers an option to share (pool) the ride with fellow passengers. We develop a queueing model to find the platform's optimal revenue at equilibrium when passengers are strategic and drivers are independent agents. We find that offering both solo and pooled rides is optimal when the distribution of passenger-type is not skewed and congestion is not high. In the second essay, we study pricing and quality competition between two manufacturers under a logit demand model. We find that the optimal myopic quality does not depend on competition. However, in a dynamic setting, the optimal quality depends on competition, pace of technological innovation, and pace of market expansion. In the third essay, we consider consumer-to-consumer online platforms such as eBay, Airbnb, Uber, etc., that facilitate transactions between users who are often strangers. We design a matching mechanism to maximize platform's profit when users are heterogeneous in their behavior. We argue that in some cases, the platform can earn higher profit by deliberately allowing users with a higher probability of being bad to join as well"--Pages ix-x.
